

Now Is Our Chance

KANSAS complains that interest in land buying either for speculation or for use has almost died out. The old fashioned homeseekers' excursions with their thousands of persons hunting new locations and bringing hundreds of thousands of dollars into the country as new capital month by month, are not nearly so well patronized or so high in quality of participants as formerly. Land sales have become unimportant, and are largely between near neighbors.

All that is an indication that Kansas and the plains country have absorbed about all the people they can on the old basis. Land must be cultivated much more closely, larger capital must be put into development, marketing must become more systematic and must be based on the highest principles of successful business and finance. The reaction has come, in respect to the plains country of the north and central west.

There are signs of a reaction also with respect to the Pacific coast. The coast has been overrun and in a way overcrowded, although there is still plenty of room for a few million more people. The trouble is, so many of those who go to the Pacific coast states are not producers, but rather traders, speculators, and prospectors, looking for ways to make money out of the growth of the country, but contributing comparatively little to the real development of natural resources.

Any region grows, develops, and prospers in direct proportion to the number of its real producers. The presence of a large population of traders and speculators, especially if they bring some outside money, may deceive for a time into the appearance of prosperity and growth; but in the long run, the only basis and measure of genuine prosperity and stability are the number and activity of real producers of wealth, the men who apply modern methods and sufficient capital and labor to bring the increase out of the soil, the metal out of the rock; who transform raw materials into useful manufactured articles; and who render necessary and competent service which really adds to the value of commodities.

El Paso, this whole valley, and this Rocky Mountain Southwest, stand to win, every way, through the effects of the reaction already noted both east and west. There is abundant room in this section for hundreds of thousands of persons who expect to contribute definitely to the development of the country's resources.

The Rocky Mountain Southwest is one part of the United States that is not "overdone."

The Rocky Mountain Southwest is the only section still having immense areas of unoccupied and unclaimed government lands.

The Rocky Mountain Southwest has been passed by and neglected in all the great migration movements of the last 30 or 40 years, and now it is suddenly discovered as almost a virgin country, with measureless resources and a ready welcome for every man with brains, the power and willingness to work, and some thrift.

The Rocky Mountain Southwest is no place for the lazy or incompetent man, but for the worker and the man of broad gauge and resource there is no other region on the continent offering such brilliant promise of reward for earnest endeavor and for the careful investment of labor, time, and capital.

Ibsen On Moving Pictures

SIGURD IBSEN, son of the famous Scandinavian dramatist, is not a bit worried over the prospect of his father's plays being reproduced for the "movies." It will be remembered that Sarah Bernhardt was the first to break the precedents set by the profession and to act for moving pictures. It took three months to make the films for her "Queen Elizabeth," and when it was all over, a most fatiguing experience, Bernhardt exclaimed, "Now I am immortal, I am a film!" A little later James K. Hackett and his company acted the "Prisoner of Zenda" under the Frohman management, and Frohman now announces that he will go into the moving picture business as strongly as he has gone into the drama of the stage, with fully as capable companies and all possible care for detail.

These experiences have broken down the old convention and it is to be expected that from this time on, the best actors and actresses will appear for moving pictures, just as the greatest singers make records for the phonograph.

Sigurd Ibsen was asked if he did not hear with dismay of the plans to make movies out of his father's plays. His reply is pregnant with 20th century wisdom and good artistic sense as well as a broad minded humanitarianism that does him very great credit as a man. In his authorized interview, Sigurd Ibsen says:

"It appears that a number of literary people are exercised over the prospect of seeing Ibsen's plays dragged in the mire through the moving picture theaters. I myself am not at all opposed to cinematograph reproductions of my father's plays, provided only they are intelligently and artistically presented. Many of my father's plays have already been filmed in foreign countries. I have no legal means in my power to prohibit this, and to tell the truth, neither have I any fault to find with it. My only concern is that the representation shall be artistically defensible, which is not at all impossible.

"No one can deny that there is a certain amount of material borrowed from literary masterpieces and reproduced in the cinematograph. I have only to call to mind the moving picture dramatization of Victor Hugo's 'Les Miserables,' recently seen in the cinematograph theaters in Christiania.

"If my father's plays can be given in that way to the masses, so much the better. A good film drama can give them a conception of a literary work they otherwise would have no idea of, as the price at the regular theaters do not permit them to attend. The masses should not be denied this privilege.

"The film is about to become a factor in cultural development of far-reaching importance. International and democratic as it is, the film will undoubtedly contribute to bring humanity closer together and to bridge chasms both between nations and the economic groups that constitute nations."

He has touched the true chord when he emphasizes the necessity of keeping the art upon a high plane (and we use the word art advisedly, because moving picture making is far more than a business or an industry and is truthfully to be classed, in its higher aspects at least, as an art). Ibsen correctly senses the broad philosophic and humanistic importance of this wonderful discovery, and his words of wisdom ought to go far to remove the last vestige of prejudice against the moving pictures as a proper and desirable medium of expression for the best actors and the best dramatists.

Death, As A Child Sees It

A LITTLE EL PASO girl, upon the death of her grandfather, expressed herself thus to her uncle: "Uncle Charlie, when mamma told me grandpa had gone to heaven I cried. I cried hard because I loved my grandpa, uncle Charlie. But I thought how long grandpa and uncle had been in heaven waiting for grandpa and how happy they would be when he got there and how happy he would be when he saw them again and I'm not going to cry any more because grandpa is happy and grandma is happy and uncle is happy and that makes me happy."

No word of sympathy that any past master in the art might offer could ever approach the sweetness of these words from the lips of an innocent babe. And the words of children come from the depth of the heart.

Chess Is Popular Pastime

Game, First Located in Persia in Year 1000, Is Now Played by Many Nations.
By Frederic J. Hastings

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2.—Despite the antiquity of the game, chess is today more popular as a pastime for a greater number of nations than any other game which has ever existed. The recent tournament in New York was reported in detail in the extensive European nation, while the chess devotees gloated as enthusiastically as the baseball fan this season over the success of his favorite. The rules and regulations of the game of chess are the same throughout the world and international tournaments are becoming more frequent each year.

As with several of the other old games, chess in America has only recently come into popular favor, but its advance within the past half century has been phenomenal and today there are hundreds of chess clubs in this country which are well supported, as well as six inter-state associations and several leagues of chess clubs.

Popular in Universities.
The game is becoming increasingly popular in the universities and the strongest organizations are the C. H. Y. P. League of Chess clubs which is reported in detail in the extensive European nation, while the chess devotees gloated as enthusiastically as the baseball fan this season over the success of his favorite. The rules and regulations of the game of chess are the same throughout the world and international tournaments are becoming more frequent each year.

While the university chess activities are regarded by the professional players as amateurish, they are becoming increasingly important in the interest of the game and a greater number of serious players. The University of Pennsylvania has well organized chess clubs whose matches add materially to the chess activities of the year. In the smaller colleges and even in the public high schools, both in Canada and the United States, chess is becoming a popular game and the members of the chess clubs are becoming more and more numerous.

Origin Credited to Persia.
The origin of chess is usually credited to Persia, although it has been claimed for China and India, and by a recent Spanish archeologist, for Egypt. Each of these claims is based on the traces of the game extending far back beyond authentic history. The earliest authentic history locates chess in Persia in the year 1000.

Book on Chess Written in 1300.
The first book on chess was written in Latin in 1300. It was called "De Ludo Strenuorum" and was written by a small treatise on the game was written by Alphonse IX, known as Alphonse the Wise, who died in the year 1260. The first book ever printed from metal type was "The Game and Play of Chess" by William Caxton in 1474. It was a translation of a French manuscript book on the subject. So far as is known, the oldest edition of Caxton now exists.

The game found its first home in Spain towards the close of the 15th century. In 1576, a book published his treatise which is recognized as the foundation of all modern chess. His work was published in 1576 and from that date the Italians became recognized for their chess dominance. The first chess champion of the world was Paolo Boi who defeated every master of his time including Roy Lopez himself. Boi was patronized by the king of Sicily and by Sebastian, king of Portugal, both of whom conferred honors and gifts of money upon him.

Chess was not played extensively in England until about 1745 when a Syrian named Stamma appeared in British court circles and won admiration of the nobility by his skillful playing. The game appealed especially to the literary people who were becoming more numerous in England at that period. They did much to encourage chess spirit by exploiting the game in the literature. This tended to popularize it with the educated classes. For more than half a century England held supremacy in the chess world. She lost it when Howard Staunton, her champion, refused to meet Paul Morphy, the first important player ever produced in the United States and who is even now regarded by some as the greatest chess player the world has ever seen.

Honor Roll of Morphy.
Morphy was born in New Orleans in 1837 and began to play chess when he was a boy of 10, being attracted to watching the games played by his father and uncle, the latter being at that time the leader of the New Orleans Chess club. Before he completed his school life, young Morphy's playing was pronounced unusual and his work was called "genius." He defeated the Hungarian champion and Eugene Rousseau, a player well known on both hemispheres and a number of the strongest distinguished players in America. In 1857 he was induced to come north to attend the first American Chess congress which was held in New York. His successful contests with a number of world renowned players brought him directly into the limelight. A few years later he went to England to play against the English champion. After Stanton refused to meet him, he went to Paris where he played many brilliant games with the most skillful players of Europe. Paul Morphy died at the age of 30, having in that brief life placed America on the honor roll in the chess world.

Blindfold Chess.
Morphy's mantle is generally conceded to have fallen on Harry Pillsbury who made records even exceeding Morphy's, especially in blindfold chess. Pillsbury has a public record of playing 24 games of chess at one time.

blindedfold, whereas Morphy's record was only eight. When it is considered that there are six million ways of making the first four moves in a game of chess, and that after that the number is incalculable, the marvelous memory of the players who could keep the positions of the pieces in 24 different games in his mind at the same time, and direct his own moves in each one after his opponent's moves were told to him, must stand as record making.

German Is Now Champion.
Emanuel Lasker, of Germany, the present world's chess champion, is also an adept at blindfold chess, which is a favorite form of the game. It is told of Lasker that he would play a dozen games of blindfold chess while sitting on the piazza of a summer hotel, talking to the ladies. The chess boards would be in a room inside. The bellboy would come out and tell him the moves made by his opponents and Lasker would direct the moves for his own side and go on with his conversation, seemingly oblivious to the heavy stakes that were up for the game he was playing.

The American chess champion now is Frank Marshall of the Manhattan Chess club. These players believe there is only one great chess master in a century. The first one recognized was Ray Lopez. After him comes Philidor, then Paul Morphy and, in this new century, Capablanca. Cuban from Havana who is believed by many to be the man who will go down into history as the chess leader of the present.

Not Profitable Employment.
Chess playing, as an occupation, is not a profitable employment although most of the chess masters devote their time exclusively to it and therefore earn a most precarious sort of living. Usually they haunt the chess resorts and the chess clubs and receive from 25 cents a game. Whenever there is a tournament they expect to make big profits from the stakes. No master chess player will enter a tournament unless there is a good sum of money up. It is said that Lasker is the best of the world, and that his income averages less than $5,000 a year.

In every city in Europe there are chess cafes which are haunted by the chess devotees. In one of these cafes it is quite possible for any amateur player to meet the best master in the city and play against him for a few cents a game.

There are no regularly established chess houses and no regular chess players in New York. There are several restaurants patronized almost exclusively by chess players. It is rather interesting to know that the greater number of expert chess players, no matter of what country, are apt to be of the Jewish race. The Jews in this country are liberal in their patronage of chess interests and the game seems to be especially attractive to them.

Waiting
By Walt Mason.
It's weary work, when we old men wait, remote from the mad world of men; we wait and watch by the garden gate, for the steps that never come. So many wait for the vanished things that never again arrive, for the gleam of eyes, for the whirr of wings, for the friends who are not alive. So many wait in the tumbled wreck of their early hopes, I ween! I'm waiting now for a little check from a monthly magazine. The check was earned in the long ago, when my heart was young and brave, but it doesn't come. I addle my head down to a misfit groove. The postman comes on his round, by heck, and over the gate I lean, and he brings me duns, but he brings no check from that monthly magazine. My gray hair falls on my wrinkled neck, and my eyes have lost their sheen. I have watched so long for that promised check from an old-time magazine, that I wear work for the old men, who wait as the shades descend, for joys that will never come again, for comrades and guest and friend. To wait and watch by the garden wall, for the things that are past and gone, till the sun goes down and the shadows fall, and the night is stealing on, it's weary work to remain on deck till your system is filled with spleen, and wait and wait for a needed check from a jim crow magazine.—Copyright, 1913, by George Matthew Adams.

The Letter Box

A Short Story.
By George Fitch.
Author of "At Good Old Sivanah."

LD father Gobbin removed the old letter box in front of the postoffice which was to be torn down. Slowly and carefully he took apart the old wooden box. Suddenly he stopped.

"Look at that," he exclaimed. A letter which had been dropped in the box had accidentally stuck in a crack. It must have been there for many years for the paper was yellow with age and covered with cobwebs. Father Gobbin put on his spectacles, wiped off the front of the envelope with his sleeve and read the address. Somewhere in the world there must be a person who has been waiting for this letter for many years. This was very strange, indeed. The address read:

Private Peter Gobbin, 60th Artillery, Marcellus.

The letter was intended for his son, Peter, who had died in Tonkin 30 years ago. Who might have written to Peter? It was his own, nor his wife's handwriting. He opened the envelope and read: "My Own Dear Peter: Forgive me. It must not and like this. That is impossible. It was cruel of me to act as I did and say such things to hurt your feelings. Now that you are no longer here, I confess that I did not know what I was saying. I was beside myself with jealousy, because you had married a girl who was much more beautiful than I was. I was so much ashamed to tell you so last night."

"What annoyed me most was that this should happen on the last night of your fatherhood. I knew that that was the last night I should see you again and that was the reason why I wanted you all to myself. I was unkind to you, and I suffered while you danced with the other. I told you that it was all over between us. Peter, that I could never be your wife, but I did not mean it."

"Write and tell me soon that you are no longer angry with me and that you will not do what you threatened to do, and I will go to the other side of the world and live with you. You really left this morning without saying goodbye to me! We were to have been married in three months and now I have lost you just because of my temper."

"Now that you are no longer angry, now that I have made the first step, I did wrong, but I feel you will forgive me. Write and tell me that there is no man in the world for me but you. Write and tell me right away that you won't resist. Everything is forgiven and forgotten."

"Thousand kisses. Your loving mother, Mrs. Gobbin." Old father Gobbin felt his eyes growing dim, as he read the letter and his heart ached with the thought of his boy who had been so good, so kind, so true, so loyal, so brave, so generous, so full of life, so full of love, so full of hope, so full of faith, so full of courage, so full of strength, so full of power, so full of glory, so full of honor, so full of fame, so full of wealth, so full of
